

My work raises huge issues for me that I want help in how to wrestle with.

It's hard for me to think creatively about work.

I'm not sure I want to wrestle with what's going on in the workplace because of what it might open up for me.

I'm fed up of trying to be a superhero, coping with the demands of work and family.

My work demeans me.

My work is just part of the secular world—the real work of God is done at church.

Work takes up so much of my time there's not much left for church.

Our work itself can be our ministry and mission, not just the means by which we earn a living or promote the church.

My workplace culture oppresses me.

Christian ministry in the workplace should be valued as much as ministry associated with church-related activities.

Christians are called to live out their faith, giving glory to God, in the whole of their lives—including their work lives.

God can speak relevantly and powerfully to issues confronting Christians in the world of work.

I find it difficult to reconcile my faith and my experience of work.

The Christian community is a safe haven in an abrasive society—Sunday's my day off!

My work is a gift from God.

I'm not sure how all the parts of my life fit together.

What difference can one life make in the face of global poverty and the power of multi-national companies?
